By Dr. Sam King Our post-modern world is marked by a growing cynicism about the authenticity and relevance of faith to public life. As research from the Pew Forum indicates, young people make up a core group in the so-called "nones" and "spiritual but not religious" demographic, who are at best apathetic about the role and place of faith in the real world. From my own observations and interactions with young Christians, I think one reason for this rising phenomenon is that young people have often not been sufficiently exposed to a sustainable worldview or mentoring model that helps them to reconcile what they believe with what they do and how they live. In this classic, Dr. Steve Garber masterfully fills this void by presenting a compelling framework about how young people, a demographic that his life's work has revolved around, can bridge the seeming chasm between belief and behavior. Drawing from thousands of hours of research and comprehensive interviews, as well as from familiar cultural and social icons and trends, from Bob Dylan to the erstwhile Smashing Pumpkins, Dr. Garber presents an integrated three-strand model that focuses on the importance of worldview, mentoring and community in weaving a Fabric of Faithfulness: "Over the course of hours of listening to people who still believe in the vision of a coherent faith, one that meaningfully connects personal disciplines with public duties, again and again I saw that they were people (1) Who had formed a worldview sufficient for the challenges of the modern world, (2) Who had found a teacher who incarnated that worldview, (3) Who had forged friendships with folk whose common life was embedded in that worldview. There were no exceptions." Dr. Garber's approach is not abstract or purely empirical research driven either, as the Fabric of Faithfulness is enriched from the well of his personal experience. This work is partly a product of him wrestling with the same issues about how to reconcile belief with behavior and purpose, a journey that involved temporarily dropping out of college. His quest for understanding the interaction of belief with behavior was also intensified early on as he observed how many young people, in the course of their college education and post-college careers, "began to disconnect what they said they believed from how they lived." I think this book will be very helpful for young people who are trying to find their purpose and way in life, especially those who have lingering questions about the role and place of faith in forming educational and workplace identities. It will also be helpful for those who, either through their work roles (career advisors, campus ministers, etc), or personal connections (parents) are in a position to serve as a positive influence in the lives of young people. In general, the book will be helpful for anyone who is confused, discouraged or unsure about how to incorporate a faith-based worldview into what they do and how they work. 2 of 2 people found the following review helpful. Without a doubt, Garber is on the of most ... By W Evans Without a doubt, Garber is on the of most profound, thought-provoking, and inspiring authors I've ever encountered. I find myself unable to go more than 2 pages without having to delve off into a sidebar to see the implications of what he's talking about and think about the questions he raises. This should be required reading for any Christian Intellectual. 0 of 1 people found the following review helpful. Beautiful prose and a deep philosophical and theological treatise. By Liza Piatt, author of Dying to Live: A Spiritual Memoir Steven Garber is a remarkable author and theologian. This is the second book I have read by this Biblical scholar and writer. I was not disappointed in the least by this book of Garber's. His thoughtful approach to the Christian life, combined with the poetry of his prose makes this a book well-worth reading! His theme is a challenge to live and behave in a way that confirms the genuineness of our faith and belief. His use of stories of students and more mature adults and how they live out their faith in their vocations and careers is inspiring. Any serious-minded Christian who reads this book will be challenged to examine his or her Christian walk, and to seek God's wisdom for how he or she should continue to live for Christ in a world full of distractions.

Voted one of Christianity Today's 1998 Books of the Year! All kinds of important choices are made during the college years. Young men and women explore what they really believe about the nature of the world and the purpose of life. They choose their work. They build friendships and often choose to marry. They develop goals and adopt habits that may last a lifetime. Yet late modernity is not a welcome environment for emotional, intellectual and spiritual formation. Society is increasingly fragmented. And the educational system itself, fragmented and specialized, may disintegrate more than it integrates. How do parents, professors, campus ministers, youth pastors and others help students, during one of the most eventful and intense periods of life, learn to connect what they believe about the world with how they live in it? Steven Garber vigorously engages just that question in this revised edition that includes a new chapter on what he has learned about lifelong formation in the years since the book first appeared. Drawing on the history of ideas, ethics, sociology and popular culture, he offers must-reading on the critical lifework of making sense of life.

About the Author Steven Garber is the principal of The Washington Institute for Faith, Vocation Culture, which is focused on reframing the way people understand life, especially the meaning of vocation and the common good. A consultant to foundations, corporations and schools, he is a teacher of many people in many places.
